, and there would be an error at the server side. Actually, this is the most common case. I will go on my way at this point. Let's face the fact that there is no real difference between writing an app for the Mac and an app for Windows. Since the process is the same for both platforms, the only difference I think is that you need to sign your app, on Mac, with a special distribution certificate which will be added to the organizer's keychain. So in this case, there is a difference, I guess. On Mac, if you are working with other Mac developers, your app will be signed with this Mac App Store distribution certificate. So, I will assume you won't have this kind of certificate. What I will show you is the process for the certificate on Windows. In Mac, if you use the organizer's keychain, you don't have to pay the Apple developer's membership fee. On Windows, you do. But still, it's really a keychain, it's just that it's stored in a file. So, in this article, I will be showing the process of creating a valid.cer, validating it and generating a.pfx and a.p12. These files are the ones that will be added to the keychain, under Windows. 1) Create a certificate request 2) Submit the request to Apple 3) Get the answer back 4) Sign the application 5) Activate your developer's certificate Open Keychain Access. On the left, go to the "My Certificates" group, and open Certificates, you should see your login's certificates (Organizer's certificates). On the right, there should be the + button and under that there's a blank box. Fill it with your name, and the.cer file extension and save it. Now that you have your certificate ready, go to the AppStore Connect web application and create a new request. There you will have to paste your certificate and fill in the other info. For the password, you can use a pincode if you want to make it really secure. You can easily get it from your bank, using your account
