Aided by his friend Sir Bedivere, he leads them to a final victory over Mordred and the bad king, and rewards them with peace. Background William, later to become William the Conqueror, was a younger son. In his own words "When I was a young child, King Edward came to my house and asked my father, who was then Earl of March, where he could find a king to succeed him." It was the succession to the throne of England that William, in the late 1050s, had sought to secure. His elder brother Edmund Ironside had already died (probably in 1053). According to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, his father Edward the Confessor died at Christmas 1066, and his body was brought to Dover on the third day of the following month. William claimed the crown in January. He then rode to London, on his way to the church of St. Peter ad Vincula to be crowned. In London, he met many of the leading men of his realm, perhaps those whom he had consulted in the early days of his reign, including the Anglo-Saxon earls and the senior clergy. Some men and women opposed his accession. Many more, however, accepted it. There were two chief motives for doing so. Firstly, it was widely thought that Edward would, on his death, be succeeded by his brother, the Bishop of London, Eadwig. Secondly, William promised to keep in close touch with the Church, and promised to keep the Church loyal. The Church, however, had problems. William reneged on a promise that all the landed estates in England would be given to the clergy (the Domesday Book). He also changed the rules of the royal household. In the cc6f4944dd
