Where seat covers earn their place

A properly fitted seat cover is a sacrificial layer. That's the whole concept, and it's a good one.

The cover absorbs the UV, the heat cycling, the abrasion from getting in and out, the sunscreen, the sweat, the spilled coffee and the kids' shoes. The factory upholstery underneath stays in essentially the condition it was in the day you fitted it. When the cover eventually shows wear, you replace the cover — not the seat.

There's a second benefit people underrate. Because the cover sits above the seat rather than being bonded to it, the trapped air acts as a modest thermal buffer. It won't make a 70°C cabin comfortable, but it takes the worst of the surface heat off the material underneath.

What to actually look for

- Custom fit for your exact make, model and year. This matters more than any other single factor. Universal covers bunch, slide and gape — and they gape worst at the bolsters, which is precisely the area taking the most sun and the most wear. A cover that doesn't stay put isn't protecting anything.

- Stitching and thread quality. UV degrades thread just as it degrades panels, and thread has far less material to lose. Double-stitched seams and UV-stable thread are what separate a cover that lasts five summers from one that opens up in two.

● Airbag compatibility — check this properly. Most modern vehicles have side airbags housed inside the outer seat bolster. Covers designed for these seats use an engineered tear seam (sometimes called an SRS seam) that splits instantly on deployment. Worth knowing: Australian Design Rules govern vehicles, not aftermarket accessories, so there is no certification stamp to look for. That means the responsibility sits with you — check your owner's manual or look for the SRS AIRBAG tag on the seat, then insist on covers explicitly stated to be compatible, and make sure they're installed with the tear seam correctly aligned.
